

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Ana Mendes' current research addresses health related quality of life impact due to indoor air contaminants in susceptible group populations. Additionally she is working in a range of topics such as occupational, indoor and environmental settings that include: Human exposure and health risk assessment, indoor air quality applied laboratory and field studies and health impact assessment applied to contemporary problems. Other research experience and interests include: health and safety risk assessment, study of sustainable systems particularly environmental impacts of energy production and environmental awareness through education for sustainability. She's a PhD candidate for Biomedical Sciences at Abel Salazar Institute for Biomedical Sciences (ICBAS), University of Porto.